In the current (June 2008) Atlantic, an anonymous writer has published a rather scathing essay on an increasingly important dynamic in American higher ed. "Professor X" (he is apparently-or at least hopefully-unaware of the association of his nom de plume with the X-Men) argues that the increase in access to college in the second half of the twentieth century has not correlated with a ...

An essay in June's Atlantic Monthly, "In the Basement of the Ivory Tower," bemoans the difficulties of teaching developmental students. "Remarkably few of my students can do well in these classes," writes the anonymous Professor X. "Students routinely fail; some fail multiple times, and some will never pass, because they cannot write a coherent sentence."

The geology of Ivory Coast is almost entirely extremely ancient metamorphic and igneous crystalline basement rock between 2.1 and more than 3.5 billion years old, comprising part of the stable continental crust of the West African Craton. Near the surface, these ancient rocks have weathered into sediments and soils 20 to 45 meters thick on average, which holds much of Ivory Coast's groundwater.
